

"EVOLUTION AND REPEATED GAMES"

(joint work with Drew Fudenberg)

ERIC MASKIN

School of Social Science, Institute for Advanced Study, Einstein Drive
Princeton, NJ 08540
maskin@ias.edu

Consider a two-player symmetric repeated game in which players make mistakes with positive probability. We show that any evolutionarily stable strategy must result in a nearly efficient outcome if the discount rate and mistake probability are sufficiently small (but still positive). Furthermore, if the mistake probability is an order of magnitude smaller than the discount rate, then evolutionarily stable strategies exist.